Name Underground Canal System, Worsley Delph, 18th Century
Map Sheet SD70SW
Grid Reference Centroid SD 7480 0050 (MBR: 10m by 10m)

Summary

Description Old stone quarry at Worsley Delph, used extensively in building for centuries, developed in the 1750s as site for canal systems built by Duke of Bridgewater and his Worsley agent John Gilbert. They set about building a canal between Manchester and Worsley to transport the Dukes's coal, in 1753. A sough was cut at low level; draining river and supplying canal with water: built large enough to allow boats to pass down it, revolutionising coal transport underground (1). Underground canal was c.10ft wide, 8ft high (water being a further 3-4ft deep). Canal was a single tunnel known as the main level, the coal was worked around it, eventually other canals at different levels were cut.(2) All are LB2 status.

Summary

Description The end of the C18th witnessed the development of the underground canal system with three levels connected by shafts; eventually the two lower levels extending the system to some 46 miles in length (1). The arrival of the rail- way system and developments in coal mining made the canal system redundant; in 1887 the last coal was transported along the subterranean canal. The last long pointed narrow boat was removed from the Delph in 1961 (2). Two locks were built circa 1760, which included wooden gates and original machinery with iron cog-wheels. Situated to the S. of the coal-mine working canal tunnels (1). SAM covers the two tunnel entrances with sluice machinery and the masonry faced wharf projecting southwards into the Delph Basin.

Summary

Description Sluice gate. Formerly listed as Pair of Locks, Worsley Rd. Circa 1760 by James Brindley although heavily restored. Timber structure (gate removed) with cast-iron mechanism. The gate was designed to slide vertically within side restraints. The hand turned winch, cast-iron cog-wheels and pulley wheels (one of which is missing) were arranged so as to lift the gate within the simple timber structure. The sluice was used to enable mine boats to exit by means of a surge of water.

Summary

Description 2 of 3 18th century dry docks survive with stepped sides. These were part of the boat repair yard. To north on Worsley Green is a memorial to the 3rd Duke of Bridgewater made out of the base of a chimney for the forge in the repair yard. On opposite side of the canal are the remains of an 18th century kiln and a warehouse which were rebuilt from a former forge.(1)

Summary

Description The ice house in question should not be confused with the Worsley Hall ice house which is still standing. This ice house was a bee-hive shaped structure that was designed to conserve blocks of ice from winter until the summer heat made cool drinks a welcome part of the diet of the third Duke of Bridgewater until his death in 1803. (1) The structure was partially underground and located on land at Worsley Delph. The ice house was eventually demolished in 1952.

Summary

Description Coke production was established by 3rd Duke of Bridgewater. Business was expanded by the Bridgewater Trust to meet demand. These ovens (mostly the `bee hive` type) were modernised and later, new ones built. In 1835 coke production was 225 tons per week from 24 ovens. 12 coke ovens were built at Worsley for supplying the demand for fuel for the railways that were being planned and built c. 1839. (1)

Summary

Description An attractive, early Victorian house - or possibly even earlier. There are three storeys, with an extension of a slightly later date. The main door to the house, is now in the extension - formerly it was centrally placed, but it is now a window, with a blocked window above. The doorway has a halfmoon fanlight and engaged columns. It is possible that the extension was in fact a one up, one down cottage of which there are a number of in Worsley, and was an entirely separate building.

Summary

Description Five cottages, dating to the 1760's. Possibly a former farmstead. Each, built of roughcast brown brick, with half-hung flush casements, large old thin slates on roof, chimneys have projecting bricks, (once thatched). The end cottage features a large barn door. Other doors are wide. Excellent group, good group value. Recommend listing Grade 2. ADDITIONAL INFORMATION:--- No.117, - two windows and with former coach-house wing adjoining. The cottages have original entrance doors, with fairly wide boards and beaded frames set near-flush, plus near-flush casements. Built probably, by John Gilbert, for the Duke of Bridgewater's operatives.

Summary

Description Very large, quite imposing public house. There are some 2 storey and 3 storey sections. It is built of irregular blocks of worked red sandstone. The upper storeys are half timbered. The windows are mullioned with leaded lights throughout. The porch and central bay are slightly jettied with corbelling (porch) and denticulation (bay). The chimneys are of pressed brick and seem to be a later addition. There is a datestone - 1903 - and the roof has stone tiles.

Summary

Description This site comprises substantial remains of the base of a lime kiln, built probably in the 1760s at the time of the construction of John Gilbert's Bridgewater Canal and the adjacent underground coal mine canal system. The base of the massive kiln is visible and there will be buried features around it, including an infilled canal arm which allowed barges to come right up to the kiln for loading/unloading and possible evidence for water power/hoist mechanisms as the Worsley Brook runs close to or under the kiln. Whilst the upper part of the kiln has been truncated and capped, it is likely that there is good survival of the lower portion of the pot or bowl together with vents and drawing holes and the access tunnel. The kiln lies on the edge of Worsley Conservation Area and has historic value as part of a group of monuments associated with the Worsley Delph coal mine and Bridgewater Canal which forms part of a World Heritage Site proposal (1). There is a drawing by John Claude Nattes of 1807 showing the lime kiln (2). Study produced clear evidence for a lime kiln of a "draw" type. Documented by the mid 18th century and associated with an arm of the Duke of Bridgewater's Canal. Probably of stone or brick construction. Each pot within the kiln was fired at the base and filled with layers of fuel and raw material from above. The draw holes allowed a through draught which provided oxygen to the process and a series of connecting tunnels allowed access. The process was therefore continuous. Complex includes a possible chimney, kiln pots, arches, tunnelling and kilns. Also included are a mortar mill and culvert from a brook. Evidence from the fabric indicates a number of separate phases, shown by the battered brickwork (3).

 Summary Archaeological watching brief revealed two timbers, probably the remains of revetting fabric to protect the canal bank. Also the presence of a stone flagged floor, possibly associated with the operation of the sluice.
 Description Evidence for activities associated with the Delphs industrial past were discovered in Trench 2(south west). This included two timbers positioned behind the concrete bridge foundations, which are probably the remains of revetting fabric used to protect the canal bank from erosion as depicted in an etching dating to the 19th century. Other material included the presence of a stone flagged floor, which was possibly associated with the operation of the sluice machinery positioned adjacent to it. The late 19th century pottery resting above the flags might be indicative of the Delphs closure at this time(1).
